Economist Robert Higgs observed that many planters were willing to trade off some potential earnings in return for the social solidarity achieved by pursuing white supremacist values (130). Many planters may have also believed that it was advantageous to maintain a supply of low-paid farm workers by limiting economic mobility for sharecroppers. The erosion of opportunities for decision responsibility and for education worked against black farmers pursuit of independent farming. USDA studies during the 1930s revealed that the production contracting and furnishing system of previous decades created dependency and ignorance about economic alternatives (Woofter 142-43; Daniel 1985, 85-87). But sufficiency. The first two directions proved to be although opportunities and capabilities for operating unsustainable, but they reemerged in later years as key independence were systematically undermined, the strategies for supporting the independence of black desire of tenants and sharecroppers to achieve the life farmers. The third initiative helped many farmers of an independent farmer was not extinguished. avoid the continuous indebtedness and peonage that often resulted from cotton sharecropping and crop lien finance. Independent Farming The Farmers Alliance of the 1880s and early 1890s was a significant cooperative organizational move-Initiatives, 1886-1932 ment. The Alliance spread throughout the Plains states and the South by regionally organizing into northern Between 1886 and 1932, there were several types and southern branches.
