Not illustrated. 1823 Excerpt: . . . is limited, and the means employed are more or less defective and injudicious. To form the character of the human being, male and female, as it ought to be formed, requires arrangements far different from any which have yet been combined for this purpose. And a long experience leads me to conclude that education, in its enlarged and proper sense, may now be easily applied to make devils or angels of all mankind, yet that no two devils or angels can be made alike, under any system that human beings, wth their present knowledge, are competent to devise. i Under the single family system, neither capital, time nor talent, can be so advantageously employed as under a well organized economy, which unites many families as one. 100 a-year by this mode of co-operation, will give more than j1000 a-year can yield under our present practice, which makes a single individual family the basis or nucleus of the arrangements of society. Much valuable time is now wasted in petty disagreeable domestic matters, which injure the dispositions, physical powers and mental capacities of all who are occupied in them. Under the co-operative System, on the other hand, every one who shall be properly instructed in the application of mechanical and chemical power, will, with ease and pleasure, perform as much as twenty menial miserable servants can do at present, and execute what they have to perform in a much superior manner. Nor will it be the least important...
