Not illustrated. 1871 Excerpt: .and they are unavoidably assumed at almost every step. It is the same in organic growth, movement, and decay. No limb can be moved except by the shortening or lengthening of something; that is by the attraction or repulsion of certain particles. Nothing turns on an axis merely of its own accord. If action of any kind appears to take place without the agency of these forces, as in the nerves perhaps, there is no apparent motion. 23. What then do we mean by attraction and repulsion; these universal postulates in every account of natural phenomena? Do we use them only, as some great thinkers have supposed, to express the fact that, certain changes having occurred hitherto in a certain order, we expect the same order in the same changes? It is true that we do expect it, but is this all; and is this what...
