Not illustrated. 1914 Excerpt: . of the sense of smell which is at most exceedingly variable with the individual, a more rational method was adopted for the comparison of a number of hops. The method was based upon the presence of esters in the oil which are probably responsible for the characteristic fragrance of the hops. It is known that there is a variation in odor in certain volatile oils due to the quantity of esters present. Lavender oils of different origin are known to differ in agreeableness of odor due to the varying quantity of esters present. This is also true of peppermint oils. It is not therefore unlikely that volatile oils distilled from hops of different origin would also reveal varying quantities of esters and thus account for the variable odor of the hops. While it is agreed that there are other constituents in the oil of hops which doubtless tend to influence the odor, it was found by experiment that a destruction of the esters in the oil by saponification deprived the oil entirely of its peculiar characteristic hoplike aroma. The object of this paper being solely to compare hops of different origin with respect to their odor or ester content, no cognizance will be taken of other properties which may also show considerable variation. The ester content of the various oils will be expressed by the ester number or value, i. e., the number of milligrams of potassium hydroxide required to saponify the esters contained in...
