Excerpt: . . . j3 The following LINES were-written at an early period and designed for another lady; but a poets, as well as lovers, are allowed a little freedom and permitted to indulge in fiction, the author hoped he might in this one instance, be excused for following a general example, and by a little piouj fraud, appropriating them to the person, while he offered them for the entertainment of Nevissa. N the broad surface of th Atlantic wave, Which oer its coast its foaming billows lave, There is an isle not quite unknown to Fame, A little spot, Dominica its name. Pure is its atmosphere, its lky serene, Save where a raging hurricane be seen; For then pale terror lifts its mighty hand, And ruin desolates the planters land; At nineteen years of age. Who sees whole fields in lofty whirlwinds toft, His works destroyd and all his profits lost! There dwellsamaid, whose virtues tho unknown Might add new splendor to a monarchs throne. When late on Albions happy shore she dwelt, I saw, and loves destructive passion felt: Glowd with the ardor of its purest flame, And fondly fancied that she did the same! Why from my bosom steals the heaving sigh Why does the swelling tear escape my eye Alas! remembrance wakes with all its train, Recals the past, and brings forth present pain. How oft at rising morn, or setting day, Before her mansion have I taen my way; Pleasd if my fair...
